

A Look At Personal Statement Writers

The personal statement is the best way to separate yourself from the torrent of applications that schools receive each year. It should be a concise, vivid, and specific essay about your worldview and what makes you unique. In 700 words, write clean prose that has a point. Then edit, edit, edit until only the 500 most efficient words remain. Over a topic that will set you apart. Do you know how many essays colleges receive about travelling, building houses for the poor, or winning the big game? Too many to count. Your personal statement is an opportunity to be different. If you have a passion for your internship at the local radio station and can write knowledgeably about why music is essential to you, that will set you apart. If you can explain your hobby of building electric bicycles with insight, recruiters love to read it. Avoid topics that can set you apart in the wrong way. Remember, those reading these essays ask themselves if they want you at their school. Give them a good reason to say yes. Your statement doesn't need to be a Hollywood blockbuster. If you saved a crying baby from a flood that decimated the village where you were doing community service last summer, that would probably make for a compelling personal statement. Some people have very revealing "big, important events" in their lives and should feel free to write about them. But remember that "important" is in the eye of the beholder. That could work if you can explain why getting your first car was truly important to you or how a dinner with friends is an indelible memory. Keep in mind that not every movie is an action film. Some are small and intimate but pack a bigger emotional wallop than any movie. Write about what is important to you. If you can take an old story and give it a fresh perspective and new meaning, that can be great too. If you write about being disillusioned with fables in elementary school in the context of your parents' divorce, that could be a compelling essay.

Admissions departments want to know about you now because that's the person they would be letting into their schools. Tell a story that has a beginning, middle, and end. This doesn't mean that you need to write War and Peace. It just means you need to consider your essay an evolution. Start with a situation, experience, or thought. Then complicate that thought; where does it take you? Finally, there should be a resolution, a change in thinking, a change of viewpoint, and an understanding of yourself or the world. If you're writing about the small town where you grew up, you might begin by describing its boredom and claustrophobia. But you might end by discussing the pangs of leaving that tight-knit community. Stories are about change. If you write an essay about wanting to win a soccer game, and then you win the soccer game, you've likely written something very dull.
